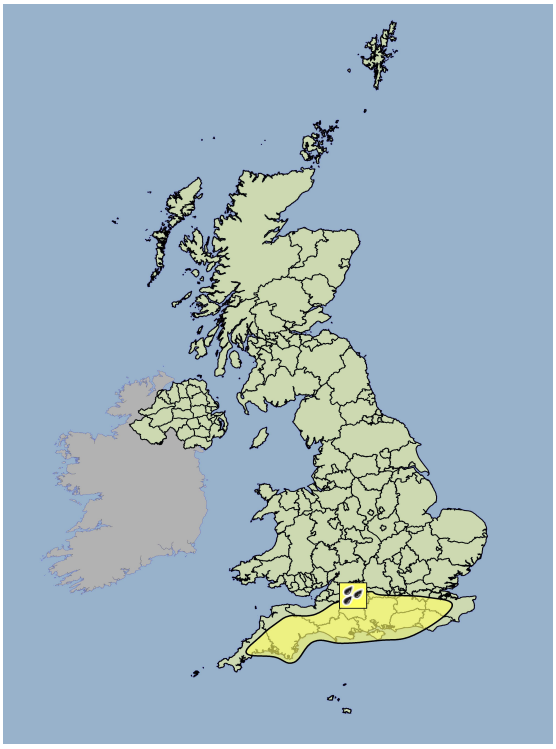
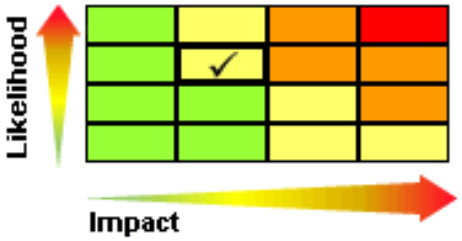
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
A deeply unstable airmass covers much of southern England. As daytime heating gets going, we can expect showers and thunderstorms to break out and to be slow-moving at times, given light winds. 10-15 mm of rain will occur in less than an hour in places with some 25 mm possible in 3 hours or less. As is usual with these situations, some places will miss the worst of the rain.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Rain

Valid from 13:15 on Tue, 29th Apr 2014 until 20:00 on Tue, 29th Apr 2014

Scattered heavy showers and thunderstorms will continue to affect southern parts of England on Tuesday afternoon and die out in the evening.

The public should therefore be aware of the risk of localised flooding. In particular surface water could lead to difficult driving conditions at times. Hail and lightning are likely to provide an additional hazard locally.

This warning has been updated to extend it further north across more of southeast England.
